The psychology behind remote working

- Stuart Duff, business psychologist, leadership and talent
- Research exploring team and leader's behaviours:
 1. Attitudes to remote working
 2. The impact of remote working
 3. Adapting to remote working
 4. Leading remote teams

The underlying attitudes...

- "I can't trust everyone in my team..."
- "There are more distractions at home..."
- "Remote working gets in the way of team communication..."
- "It's much more difficult to manage people when they are remote..."

Challenge the mindset...

- Higher levels of productivity
- Higher levels of engagement, control
- Different distractions
- Alternative ways to communicate
- Requires time invested in people

Psychological impact

1. Social contact
2. Self-management
3. Boundaries
4. Essential 'face time'
5. Change agility

Adapting to remote working

- Deliberately playful
- Structured, follow processes
- Outgoing, talkative
- More assertive and forceful
- Adventurous, experimenting

Leading remote teams

1. Personalise communications
2. Always use VC for team meetings
3. Monitor everyone, equal time
4. Keep communicating
5. Increase consultation in decision-making
